of higher prices. Among those arrested were two of Iran's more successful businessmen, Habib Elghanian and Mohammed Wahabzadeh. As much as 40 per cent of all goods lying on the Elghanian had built up a large plastics business with extensive retail quays at Khorramshahr was unclaimed in 1975. By the time the customs agents came to auction them the goods were frequently too badly damaged to be worth buying, so continuing to clutter the port.

More importantly, an important opportunity to overhaul the country's distribution network was wasted. Reducing the middle man's profits did not solve the key question of getting goods quickly and efficiently into the market. The technocrats in the Ministry of Commerce would have liked to have seen this happen but the political will that the most vigorous action was taken in those areas where the was lacking.

The obstructive tactics of the merchants, mainly the traditional of buying and maintaining a car. Wahabzadeh was accused of merchants of the Bazaar, proved too strong; and the Shah was neither ready nor willing to risk a confrontation. Indeed to mollify the merchants, Commerce Minister Fereidoun Mahdavi was removed on 7 February 1976. He had been the main champion of reorganising distribution - including the creation of a model market like London's Covent Garden Street, sent out to check prices and decide sometimes with complete

At first in May 1978 it was what was valid in Bazaar life - or for that matter to provide an acceptable substitute for the university students and teachers. Then in the autumn, from September onwards, they helped support large sections of the striking workforce, whether civil servants or oil-workers. There was no precise point when this support transformed from protest into backing for the net effect was to establish a fairly clear-cut division between revolutionary change and the overthrow of the Pahlavi dynasty. The most important Bazaar, that of Tehran, was occupied for the first time by tanks on 11 May 1978, but as early as January there had been shutdown protests. Certainly this was the beginning of increasingly frequent shutdown protest strikes. These protests were made in a riot, spearheaded by such youths, attacking the symbols of Iran's new different frame of mind from the constitutionalists' and intellectuals' wealth (the banks), its political bankruptcy (the headquarters of the Rastakhiz Party), its cultural corruption (the cinemas) and its moral decadence (liquor stores). Mixed in with this was some unashamed looting and a strong element of Azarbaijani resentment at being neglected by the Tehran Bazaar leadership was provided by a five man Bazaar the central government. However, one of the remarkable features of the ensuing demonstrations was the large scale participation by the Bazaaris. The boom had created a fertile source of women.
