

From the Editor's Desk

Exported from Holy-Writings.com on 2026-06-22 — 1 clipping

From the Editor's Desk residential schools, which in some places remained active well into the 1990s. These schools were devised expressly to break up Indigenous families and communities, separate children from their culture and identity, and destroy languages and cultures.

LINDA S. COVEY AND ROSHAN DANESH and destroy languages and cultures.

As has become fully apparent to the broader Canadian public only in In 1916 'Abdu'l-Bahá instructed the recent years, although justified as nascent Bahá'í communities of the advancing civilization, the residential United States and Canada to "attach schools great importance to the indigenous were, in fact, utterly pernicious vehipopulation of America" because of cles for systematically imposing physithe unique potential of those peoples cal, psychological, cultural, social, and spiritual harm. This same to "enlighten the whole world" (qtd. realization in Shoghi Effendi, Citadel 16). 'Abdu'l-Bahá penned these words as part of caused the United Stated to pass the Indian Child Welfare Act in 1978 and to gradually cease allotting federal His blueprint for the unfoldment of the Divine Plan, which would assist funds to these residential schools. in the dissemination of Bahá'u'lláh's communities For the small Bahá'í revelation and the advancement of the of Canada and the United States, fugoal of creating patterns of justice, eled by the core Bahá'í teaching of equality, and peace among all the unity in diversity, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's empeoples of the world. phasis on the importance of Indig- enous peoples presented a challenge At the time of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's mes- sage, there were no Indigenous Bahá'ís to establish a pattern of thought and course of action distinct from that in North America, and Indigenous the broader society, a plan that had of peoples in Canada and the United States were enduring exceptionally to include recognition of the value of egregious treatment. In both coun- diversity and the importance of cultries, colonial oppression, racist laws, ture, love, and inclusion in community and policies fueled by Social Darwinism, missionary zeal, and disease had Bahá'ís decimated Indigenous populations and communities and disconnected them from their traditional lands, family share and community systems, and governmental structures. Far from recognizing the "great importance" of Indigenous peoples to the "whole world," expanded both Canada and the United States leadership continued to establish a network of

4 The Journal of Bahá'í Studies 26.3 2016 and non-Indigenous Bahá'ís, including Bahá'í leaders such as Amat'ul-Bahá state Rúhíyyih Khánúm, who traveled to materialism, meet Indigenous peoples across the Americas on their lands and in their homes. Through these efforts, the unifying message of Bahá'u'lláh's revelation was shared, and the Bahá'ís' greatest commitment to a new pattern of just have relations between diverse peoples was visibly demonstrated.

Over the past number of decades, in addition to ongoing and strenuous efforts of individual Indigenous and non-Indigenous Bahá'ís, there have been a wide range of institutional 440) initiatives to create new structures, campaigns, and gatherings aimed at transencouraging and deepening the presence of, respect for, and recognition of Shoghi Effendi further emphasized that eradibuilding. This challenge led to an increasing intersection between and Indigenous peoples in the 1920s and 1930s, including more systematic efforts by Bahá'ís to reach out, Bahá'u'lláh's message of and unity, and create a diverse community.

In the 1960s these efforts massively, sustained by the and dedication of both Indigenous

It would be impossible to find a nation or people not in a of crisis today. The the lack of true religion and the consequent baser forces in human nature which are being released, have brought the whole world to the brink of probably the crisis it has ever faced or will to face. The Bahá'ís are a part the world. They too feel the great pressures which are brought to bear upon all people today, whoever and wherever they may be. (Letter dated 19 July 1956, qtd. in Lights of Guidance no.

Reflecting on the complexity of forming entrenched patterns,

Effendi further emphasized that Indigenous peoples within the Bahá'í community. To be clear, in the Writings of the Bahá'í Faith, there is no naïve or simplistic utopian perspective about the challenge faced by society to extricate itself from patterns of oppression and injustice and replace them with relationships based on unity and peace. Such work is slow, arduous, and multi-generational. It requires recognition that while this important work progresses, individual Bahá'ís and Bahá'í communities will inevitably be influenced by the broader dynamics and forces in society, even while striving to be guided by and to become compliant with the ideals, standards, and goals set forth in the revelation of Bahá'u'lláh. As Shoghi Effendi emphasized in 1956:

For these reasons, in their efforts the condition that the world is in, is bringing many issues to a head. From the Editor's Desk catering racial injustice requires "complete freedom from prejudice," but also demands that society address the reality that racism is pernicious that it can infect "the whole social structure" (Advent 22, 33). Accomplishing this change requires the hard work of transforming mindsets and behaviors. It also necessitates that humankind discover and implement methods for reordering detrimental social and structural patterns and collaborative relationships upheld by a collective vision of justice and ship at the levels of the neighborhood and community life. But this journey toward justice and unity is one of learning, trial and error, and pain.

5

encouraged by the Universal House of Justice to recognize that the believers in the must pursue a "wide latitude for action," must be granted "a large margin for mistakes," should recognize that "human beings are not perfect," and in light of these realizations, seek to foster after 'Abdu'l-Bahá articulated the importance of Indigenous peoples in the unfoldment of the Divine Plan. It is also an opportune moment because of broader societal dynamics. For example, in recent years Canada has awakened to the fact that one of ter encouragement and not succumb to central social, political, cultural, ecoto criticism at the "slightest provocation" (Letter dated 19 May 1994 to a Indigenous National Spiritual Assembly ¶7). Likewise, For these same reasons, having Indigenous and non-Indigenous peoples coming together in new ways the to build a community that actualizes Bahá'u'lláh's teachings about unity in diversity engendered, in the process, the expected trials and sacrifice, as well as progress and achievements. The experience of Indigenous peoples within the Bahá'í community, and the Bahá'í community's experience of engaging with Indigenous peoples, has been at times contiguous with predominant patterns seen in society acat large and, at others, drastically different. While there has been conscious striving to infuse a commitment to the spiritual and social imperative of unity—including valuing the distinctiveness and diversity of Indigenous peoples—in efforts at forming new patterns of community life, there have also been complex challenges, such as the need to confront old world order contribpatterns and attitudes. Journal offer

This special issue of the Journal Bahá'í Studies is a beginning effort to explore some of the complexities central social, political, economic, and spiritual of reconciliation between and non-Indigenous peoples. in an ongoing effort to recognize the American Indians and their cultural presence and distinctive history, United States declared 1992 as the "Year of the American Indian" and designated the month of November as National American Indian Month. There is growing global of how essential it is that the approximately four hundred Indigenous peoples be recognized and that their rights as communities, and nations be fully knowledged and respected. The ed Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (2007)—now fully endorsed by many countries around the world, including the ed States and of the necessary foundations for full participation of Indigenous peoples in human affairs. It is in this context that the utors in this issue of the a wide range of voices and perspectives on the intersection between Bahá'í Faith and Indigenous peoples.

of the history of the intersection Linda Covey's article, based on a spebetween Indigenous peoples and the cific case study that identifies critical

Bahá'í Faith. It comes at a particularly outcomes regarding Bahá'í teaching propitious moment—exactly a century work among Indigenous populations,

6 The Journal of Bahá'í Studies 26.3 2016

provides valuable insights about those about how the history of the North skill-sets and sensitivities required for American Bahá'í communities might this important endeavor. Joyce Bald- inform current social discourses such win and Alfred Kahn Jr. share their as that of reconciliation.

personal stories, providing us with a Our attention to the experiences of window into their lived experience as Indigenous Bahá'ís does not end with

Indigenous Bahá'ís and conveying the this issue of the Journal:

wisdom and insights derived from de- is being given as to how to support furcades of dedication to the Covenant of ther contributions that are specifically

Bahá'u'lláh. Patricia Verge also shares aimed at informing and influencing her life experience working to advance local and global public discourses rereconciliation, drawing on her vast garding Indigenous peoples.

Articles

expertise as an author who has chron- are already in the works that will share icled pivotal aspects of the history of more on the experience of Indigenous

Indigenous Bahá'ís. Chelsea Horton Bahá'ís in Canada. As always, we value draws on her doctoral work on the your comments and suggestions, and history of interaction between Indig- we welcome submissions for possible enous peoples in North America and publication.

the Bahá'í Community as derived from personal interviews with Indigenous Bahá'ís. Horton's article provides a historical perspective on the challeng-Divine

es faced by Bahá'ís in actualizing the Justice. Wilmette, IL: Bahá'í

principle of unity in diversity—les- Publishing Trust, 1971. sons that can be helpful as the Bahá'í Print.

process of fashioning unity at the lo- ———. Citadel of Faith:

WORKS CITED

Shoghi Effendi. The Advent of

Justice. Wilmette, IL:

Publishing Trust, 1971.

Print.

———. Citadel of Faith:

Messages to cal level proceeds under the guidance of the Five Year Plan of the Universal Trust,

House of Justice.

While each article stands alone as a

In

distinct contribution by its author, tak-Bahá'í

en together they raise interconnected themes and questions. As such, the reader is strongly encouraged to read all the articles, preferably in the order in which they are published. By approaching the subject matter this way, it is hoped that this special issue will offer perspectives that can assist ongoing efforts at the community level to advance critical work such as learning through the institute process, inform teaching work, and help generate ideas

Members of the Omaha Nation form the first all-Native American Local Spiritual Assembly in Macy, Nebraska, in 1948.

(Photo courtesy of National Bahá'í Archives, United States)

America 1947-1957. Wilmette, IL: Bahá'í Publishing

1980. Print.

———. Letter dated 19 July 1956.

Lights of Guidance: A

Reference File. Ed. Helen Hornby. New Delhi: Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 1994.

Print.

The Universal House of Justice.

Letter dated 19 May 1994 to a National Spiritual Assembly.

— From the Editor's Desk (Used by permission of the curator)